Postcolonial and Black British Literary Studies

Gender; Intersectionality; Power; Environmental Crisis; Displacement; Digital Humanities

Linda Munki is a DAAD GROW Research Fellow, a Visiting Researcher at the University of Bayreuth, and a Lecturer at the University of Yaoundé I. Her research focuses on gender, intersectionality, power, environmental crisis, displacement, and memory, with a particular interest in how literature illuminates the relationship between historical power structures and contemporary crises. Her approach considers colonial history as indispensable while also examining how post-independence political structures, institutional failures, and social divisions shape contemporary realities.

Her current research project investigates how gendered experiences of conflict and displacement during the current violent phase (since 2017) of the Cameroon Anglophone Crisis are produced, mediated, and contested across literary and testimonial narratives. It conceptualises narrative representation as a site of epistemic production in which meaning, agency, and marginality are actively constructed rather than merely reflected.

Alongside her literary research, Linda is developing an interdisciplinary interest in Digital Humanities and Artificial Intelligence, particularly the possibilities and challenges these approaches create for literary research, interpretation, and the study of cultural memory.
